Living Out the True Narrative in the Everyday of Monday

For far too long, Christians in the workplace have lived with a fractured faith. We receive rich biblical teaching on Sundays, yet step into the office on Mondays only to find those truths seemingly disconnected from the tensions and realities of the workplace. Perhaps, we may have acquired a wealth of practical workplace skills, only to lose sight of the gospel's overarching narrative amid the pressures of daily work. "Monday Disciples" bridges this long-standing divide.

With remarkable insight, the author begins with the "narrative" that shows how our lives at work are often quietly shaped—and even hijacked—by five false narratives. Rather than asking "how should I carry out my work?", the book first addresses the more fundamental questions: "Who am I?" and "What is the story that I am part of?"

The author redefines our personal story, world view and theology of work drawing on the Bible's grand narrative of Creation, the Fall, Redemption, and New Creation. In doing so, she helps us view the workplace not merely as a battlefield to survive in, but a place where God is continually at work.

While affirming the goodness of work and its redemptive potential, the book avoids the pitfalls of prosperity theology with marvellous precision.

Moreover, the book restores the theological connection between faith and work, reinforcing its teachings through practical case studies and the "Salt and Light Accessment," so that biblical principles are no longer felt as being suspended in theory. Its concise, engaging chapters also make it an excellent resource for small groups in church, helping to foster the transformation of workplace culture.

For pastors, this book is an outstanding guide to shepherding believers in the workplace. For working Christians, it is a practical manual for rediscovering their God-given calling. By translating theological truth into concrete, actionable guidance, it shows how faith can be lived out in everyday work rather than remaining as an abstract ideal.

May each of us step into Monday morning with a renewed life and fresh insights of the story that we are part of. As we enter the sphere God has entrusted to us, may we serve as His faithful disciples, bringing forth what is good seeking the flourishing of others, and bearing witness to His glory.

Keys to a Thriving Marriage Online Course

1. This course has reminded me to listen more attentively to my husband, to respect him, and to be more understanding and accepting of his weaknesses instead of criticising him so readily. It has also helped me recognise more clearly how my family of origin has shaped me. (Ms Hu)

2. The course provided opportunities to learn, reflect, share, and draw insights from the examples of others. The small-group discussions were especially meaningful. Everyone shared openly and listened to one another with genuine sincerity. (Ms Liu)

3. Both husband and wife need to work together to root out the "pests" that are harmful to their marriage if they are to cultivate a harmonious and happy relationship. Above all, a healthy marriage must be built on love and a steadfast commitment to one another. (Mr Wei)

Monday Disciples

The couse highlights with remarkable clarity the dilemma many Christians face as they struggle to reconcile their faith with the realities of the workplace. Through practical, real-life case studies, it also demonstrates how living out biblical truth at work is genuinely possible. I am eagerly looking forward to the upcoming programmes to learn more as the speaker expounds these issues in a systematic manner and help us truly live out our faith in our daily work.
